Guardian

Every machine reports to Guardian.
Guardian reports to you.

RBW systems

The Context

THE JOB	Give people the introduction to RBW Systems they'd get if Rob or James were in the room. Because more and more, they won't be. Bring RBW to life for people meeting them for the first time, and answer the one question they need answered: What is Guardian, and why is it worth changing the way I run my business?
THE ONE ACTION	Ring James on [number] to chat about Guardian.

Where are we?

RBW Systems make Guardian. Every machine in a gambling-machine business reports to it: the tickets, the money, the performance, the record. And Guardian reports to whoever runs the place. It's already running in hundreds of venues.

Almost all of that came by word of mouth. Someone who uses Guardian told someone who didn't. That's got RBW this far. It won't get them to the people who've never heard of them, and that's who this is for.

Why now? Three things.

- Someone is about to stumble across the current site.
- The work in America is taking off, and the partner there is explaining Guardian with nobody from RBW in the room.
- Somewhere, someone RBW have never met is sitting in a meeting where Guardian is the answer, and nobody says so.

Who we're talking to

The overwhelmed operator	They answer for the machines and the money. Their day is checking figures, chasing answers and piecing together what's happening: where the money is, which machines are earning, what needs attention, what's been done. They need to keep on top of the business without having to be everywhere.
Reading over their shoulder	The partners who sell Guardian without RBW in the room (Atlanta, eService), whoever this gets passed on to, and the LLMs that will read it and repeat it. Write for all of them.
What's in their way	Knowing what needs your attention takes a lot of your attention. Guardian can help with that. But improving a running business means changing how it runs, and the business has to keep going while you do. Before someone takes that on, they need to see how it will fit, and know who'll be there when they need them.
What we want them to think and do	Excited about what Guardian could do for their business. Able to see why it's worth making the change. Ready to ring James about it. Anyone who comes across the work should understand it well enough to pass it on. The people it matters to should care enough to act.

The story we're telling

Three connected thoughts: what it is, why it's worth it, and why these people. In that order. This is the agreed strategy.

1	Every machine reports to Guardian. Guardian reports to you.	What it is
2	So you can see what works and do more of it. Less time finding out what's happening. More time deciding what happens next.	Why it's worth it
3	Guardian answers to you. And so do the people behind it.	Why these people

Why believe it

Because it's already in use, and the people who use it tell everyone it's great.

300+ sites	5,000+ machines	1 billion+ tickets in and out

- 25 years in the industry for Rob. 200 across the team.
- Five endorsements on the record by name (Game Nation, Inspired Leisure, Shipley Leisure, OKTO, e-Service) and one on film.
- Game Nation started with the accounting and added ticketing when they were ready. "Fits what you've got", from someone who lived it.
- Partners who chose to work alongside RBW: eService in the field, 10-100 hosting it, ASK on payments.

How it should sound

Like RBW: an experienced, independent family business. Clear, helpful, and they take responsibility. In Stockport they call it straight dealing: we know what we're doing, we're straight with you, we stand by what we say and do.

Simple words. Short sentences. Show, don't say. Rob and James should recognise themselves in every line.

Over to You

GET	the operator who answers for the machines and the money, and everyone reading over their shoulder

TO	see why Guardian is worth changing the way they run their business, and ring James about it

BY	showing them that every machine reports to Guardian and Guardian reports to them, so they can see what works and do more of it — and that the people behind it answer to them too.

Here's what you've got to work with. A product that works. Customers who'll say so, by name. A strategy that's agreed.

The work

There needs to be a website, at www.rbw.systems. Then think about where else this introduction needs to work: a partner in Atlanta explaining Guardian without RBW there, or a meeting where Guardian could be the answer. Think about how people will discover it and share it, including through LLMs. Agree any additional formats as part of the scope.

The question, the three thoughts and their order are the agreed strategy. Everything else is yours to shape: the writing, the design, the structure and the ways of bringing it to life, within the budget and timing. Develop the copy so the thinking lands.

Use RBW's name, logo and primary colour, and lead people towards ringing James. The old site is there to read, not to build from.

Make it feel like RBW

An experienced family business where you get a straight answer and someone takes responsibility. In Stockport, they call that straight dealing. Let people meet that business through the work. Rob and James should recognise themselves in it and be happy to stand behind what it says.

Show how Guardian does its job, with the machines, kiosks and people around it. Let us see how life gets easier for the operator, and what they can do with what they learn.

Bring three things to life

1	The thinking. The answer to the question, in RBW's words.

2	A customer it already works for. One concrete story of RBW working around a customer's needs: fits like a glove, improved the bottom line. Game Nation is the one.

3	Guardian itself. Let people experience the system and what it does to a day. From the customer's side: their venue, their kiosks, their machines. Show, don't say.

Mandatories

However you think best, as long as:

• It does the job a personal introduction would. • It's clear, simple and convincing wherever it's met. • There's a website.	• The question, the three thoughts and their order stay as agreed. • Everything leads to one action: ring James. • Rob and James recognise RBW in it and can stand behind every word.

How we'll know it's worked

The partner in Atlanta opens it in a meeting and doesn't need to add a word. An operator reads it on their phone between venues and rings James. Someone asks an AI what Guardian is and gets the right answer.

The practical bits

When	Now until SITE LIVE (Q1). Two dates could land first: US START and NEXT MEETING. If either does, the answer has to exist in some form by then, even if the site doesn't.
Approvals	Rob and James's time is the scarce bit. James turns things round day to day. Rob needs the thinking in front of him before it's final, so anything that needs his yes goes in early, not at the end.
Budget	£[BUDGET].

THE ONE ACTION	Ring James on [number] to chat about Guardian. Everything leads here. Email [@] and "come for a chat at [address]" back it up where fuller details belong.